

Kate Blystone is the Outreach Manager for the Pipeline Safety Trust. She responds to requests for assistance from the public, assists with curating the Trust's list serves, and develops programs designed to enlist, train and involve citizens in pipeline safety issues and initiatives. Before joining the Trust, Kate worked for fifteen years as a public engagement specialist, land use planner and issue advocate for nonprofit organizations and private consulting firms across Washington, as well as a county planning department. In her previous job, she served as program director for RE Sources for Sustainable Communities in Bellingham, coordinating the efforts of three program areas focused on safe transport of fossil fuels, water quality protection, and youth sustainability education. She graduated from Western Washington University with a liberal arts degree, and from Eastern Washington University with a Masters in Urban and Regional Planning (MURP) and an emphasis in small town planning.
